The SPECIAL INGREDIENT

Illustration by BOB WOODWARD. Story by JIMMY WATSON

Dave was a grizzled old mountaineer whose base as a trapper, Indian fighter and cook was known throughout the frontier. A part of a man, he was as tough as a brown bear and as cunning as a fox, so it was with some surprise that Marshal Lory found him along the trail tied to a tree.

"What happened, Dave?" the marshal asked, as he cut the mountain man loose.

"Agh!" Dave growled with stripes. "I must be getting old! I was busy reading up about quads when two jaspers got the drop on me, before I knew what was going on they had me hog-tied like a yessling!"

"What were they after?"

"My job as gold dust," Dave grumbled. "They found I hidde my work."

"You want me to go after them?" the marshal asked.

"Well, especially who can get the drop on me, Dave, my job?" Dave said good-naturally, as he checked through his duffle to see if anything else was missing. "I can't be bothered with looking after any outlaws today, anyway. I'm due over at the West Falls Federal Fair tomorrow morning and have to get going. I'm sure glad you come along!"

Yes, that's right! Marshal Lory was dressed. "I'm going to be one of the judges of the braving contest again this year too. I suppose you'll see some-up some-down with your work-dough friends?"

"You're kidding, right?" Dave grinned. "And the only reason I won't be absent every year is because of a certain special something I use in braving the furnace. It's worth its weight in gold! Why, it—" Dave checked himself in mid-sentence, his eyebrows squaring together in sudden anger as he held up a small, decorative pouch. "Well, it'll be a damned sight!" he thundered, pouring the contents of the pouch into his hand.

"Gold dust!" Marshal Lory exclaimed with surprise. "They didn't get it after all!"

Dave's face was a black cloud of rage as he searched his horse.

"I'm going after those varnates!" he called over his shoulder. "They took something of mine that means a whole lot more than a little sack of gold dust!"

Mounting his own horse, the marshal set out to patrol, wondering what the outlaws had taken to make Dave so angry.

Fifteen minutes later the pair reached a bend in the trail and over the road ahead riding fast to their control them. Before weapons could be drawn the outlaws were upon them with surprising firmness.

"Whose the pouch?" Dave thundered.

"Here it is," one of them answered. "We were just coming to give it back to you!"

"Hold!" Dave growled, fumbling with the decorations on the pouch. "You mean you the covered your mules and were coming back to rob me of something more interesting?"

"I'm mighty curious to know what is the pouch?" the marshal pointed as he tied the outlaws up. "You want me to check of me on the trail, I couldn't tell you before."

Dave opened the pouch and took out what looked like a lump of white clay.

"It's that certain special something I was telling you about," he explained. "A touch of sourdough and yeast . . . to make my hot cuts rise up nice and puffy!"

Dave glowered at the outlaws. "I've carried a sourdough starter for twenty-five years! You don't come by them handily, and I'd sooner lose a little gold dust than my starter, say, hey, hey! You had for you . . . you grabbed the wrong pouch!"

Then Dave laughed at a sudden thought. "You boys got the 'dough' all right, only the wrong kind!"

Though the 'calumet' is known as the 'pipe of peace' among the American Indians, it is used in other ceremonial occasions as well as to ratify a peace treaty. It is smoked to commemorate a party's success, to celebrate a victory, to make an offering to the Great Spirit and to solemn important meetings.

In the Blackfoot ceremony the pipe is passed from left to right around a circle of smokers who have removed their moccasins. The smoke is then offered to the four cardinal directions North, South, East, and West. Then the smoking is under way.

The French Canadians were the first to give the pipe a name, the "calumet."
